Batista, interviewed in the Dominican Republic, said the rebels were better trained and better equipped for guerrilla warfare than the Cuban Army. The question arises, "where does this equipment come from?" Undoubtedly a lot of it was smuggled in from Miami and the Key West areas where Castro supporters have been assembling it for several years.

The new government seems determined to avoid any appearance of contact with Communism despite the fact that the Communists reportedly supported the revolution and may have made considerable contributions to it. Unofficial but usually reliable sources here insist that Russian submarines have been operating off the south coast of Cuba, the Fidel Castro area, and were seen to have unloaded large quantities of military equipment, guns, and ammunition, but there is no confirmation of that. Then, if that is true, this new government of Cuba bears considerable watching.

The same source says that American planes loaded with guns and ammunition have been shuttling back and forth from Florida ports for several weeks, and that this fact, with specific times, dates, and registration numbers of the planes, was reported to the Central Intelligence Agency here in Washington but nothing apparently was done about it.

The $64,000 question is rapidly becoming: "Just what does the CIA do anyway, except provide a nice job for little brother Allen Dulles?" It seems to be caught by surprise in every world crisis; all the information turned over to it seems always to go down some rat hole."
